A newspaper reporter named Hammond, out of a Job, meets a man named Faraday. They pawn Hammond's mother's watch to buy food. Faraday shows his friend a letter from Dr. Spotswood, his old guardian in Culpepper, Miss., asking him to come back home. The old man says he is dying, and wants to clear up Faraday's parentage. He tells him his father was found with his throat cut, and that since that time the house of the murder has been haunted by an apparition, and a green lamp on the study table has burned uncessingly.

With Faraday's negro servant, Zeb, the two friends, securing money, go to Culpepper on Faraday's sloop, the Beau Gallant. Faraday loses the pawn ticket for his watch. The watch has a mysterious inscription on it, which the friends believe has something to do with the mystery of the lamp.

The two friends go to the haunted mansion. On their way they are passed by a frightened man driving a buggy at full speed. They see the emerald light and the form of an aged man, which suddenly disappears. Frightened, they return to the sloop. Zeb, the servant, brings word that Dr. Spotswood is dead, his secret unrevealed. Hammond goes to the Spotswood house and is presented to Miss Esther, daughter of Dr. Spotswood, whom Faraday loves.

While Faraday and Hammond are at the Spotswood house, after the reading of the will, which makes no mentica of Synopsis of Chapters Already Published who is em. Mr. Hammona.

Informed her.

"Oh that odious creature!" she examinated.

"Has he been troubiling you—annoying you" I fancied from her tone that the little man might have been making himself offensive—an art in which he excelled.

"Not precisely," she told me. "Only —only I don't like him. He's not a genti-sman.

"He called here about three weeks a genti-sman.

"He called here about three weeks "Oh, hang 'why:" Faraday exploded. "There are entirely too many 'whys' in this case. They fuddle a fellow. Every time I get started thinking I run into a mess of 'whys'—and am none the wiser."

"I'll forgive you the pun," said I wiser."

I looked at Deal. His face, wreathed in an oily smirk, suddenly took on an expression of dismay.

"I didn't see it until you were gone," he said evasively. "I found it then and ran out on the sidewalk looking for you, but you had disappeared."
Faraday signed the check, and I waited until he had finished and handed it to the reporter. Then—"You're a liar, Deal," said I.

"What?" he demanded, rising. "What do you mean?"

"I mean you lie; you saw me leaving the restaurant just as you picked up that ticket. I saw you do it. So you've lied. I'd like to know to what end." "Mr. Faraday, sir!" he cried, turning a pasty color. "I protest, sir! Under your roof—"

a pasty color. "I protest, sir! Under your roof—"
"That is true," agreed Faraday. "As a guest of mine you should not have spoken so to Mr. Deal, Luke.

Situations Wanted Lost and Found. "But," he continued, picking up the little man's hat and handing it to him as he bowed him to the door, "I honestly believe Mr. Hammond is right Deal.

"Have you the watch yet?" I asked.
"Oh, yes."
Faraday produced it from his walstcoat pocket.
Deal considerately withdrew at this coat pocket.

Deal considerately withdrew at this stage of the proceedings, and a moment later we heard the rattle of his carriage wheels on the shells.

CHAPTER XV.

Deal's Doings.

TOM FARADAY watched Deal ou through the window, and then turned toward the lamp, under the rays of which he held the jeweled watch. He stood a moment or two, smiling meditatively and weighing the begemmed timepiece in his hand. "Curlous thing," he said to me, "powerful curious, the Deal business. What to you make of him?" "Nothing at all," I felt free to confess. "Queer all the way 'round," continued
